videoCombination of CT and DWI in evaluation of suspected renal cell carcinoma: comparison with MRI. The aim of this study was to compare the diagnostic accuracy of computed tomography (CT) and diffusion-weighted imaging (DWI) alone and in combination in a prospective study for the differentiation of malignant and benign renal masses. Consecutive cases of suspected renal cell carcinoma referred from 2005-2006 were enrolled in this study. Participants underwent MRI examination including T1- and T2-weighted sequences in both the axial and coronal planes before contrast enhancement, and DWI. The imaging features of benign and malignant renal tumors were evaluated in all cases and compared with pathological findings in a qualitative and quantitative analysis. Twenty-three patients who met the inclusion criteria were eligible for the analysis. In the qualitative analysis, the majority of benign renal masses (n = 10) showed isointensity relative to cortex on all T1-weighted sequences compared with only four malignant renal tumors, which were hypointense relative to cortex on all sequences. In addition, DWI clearly depicted and differentiated malignant renal tumors from a limited number of benign lesions (n = 5) with high sensitivity (100%) and negative predictive value (100%). There was no statistically significant difference between the areas under the receiver operating characteristics curves for CT, T2-weighted imaging, and DWI. This pilot study demonstrated that the combination of CT and DWI may be superior to any single modality for the differentiation of malignant and benign renal tumors. Gartner has released its annual predictions for the technology market and the future of Artificial Intelligence. The technology market is expected to grow from
